MORE AGGRESSIVE

and that unless they are checked trouble may be expected. The half-breeds are so well satisfied with the result of the last rebellion and the manner in which their claims for losses have been paid that they desire nothing better than a SAVANNAH, June 10.—The full details of the murder of Col. John C. Hamcock, a leading and a wealthy citizen of Crawford county, show it to have been a premeditated attack. Colonel Hamcock had for a neighbor Rev. Burnett, and Burnett objected to Hamcock having impounded some of his stock and was quarreling with him when Jerome Burnett, the 11-year-old son of the minister, stepped in. Leaving the two men to their dispute, Jerome went half a mile to his home and procured his shotgun and returned. He sat on a stump about thirty yards away from the men.

APPARENTLY OBVIOUS

to what was going on. As soon as Col. Hamcock turned full toward him, Jerome raised his gun quickly and fired, the load entering Hamcock's heart.

The occasion of this tragedy was a quarrel of a year before, when young Burnett was forbidden Hamcock's house, where resides a young woman of whom he was enamored.

Confederate Memorial.

STANTON, Va., June 10.—The largest crowd ever in Stanton assembled to-day to witness the celebration of the Confederate Memorial association. The chief attraction was the presence of Gen. W. W. Averill of New York, the orator of the occasion. The column was consisting of military and civil organizations and citizens. In a carriage drawn by four black horses, rode Governor Lee and Gen. Averill, and as they passed they were frequently cheered. After the parade the speaking took place in the opera house which was crowded to suffocation.

A MUST READ.

Introducing General Averill Governor Lee referred to their long acquaintance, beginning when both were boys at West Point and in their subsequent association in the old army. Their commands had met face to face in battle during the war that followed, and he was prepared to testify that no braver men contended on either side than the troops commanded by that gallant officer whose warfare was upon men, and not upon helpless women and children. In closing the governor referred to the liberation of the sectional line and the reunion of the people as shown by the prisoners of the federal general joining with the southern veterans in honoring the confederate dead. General Averill was greeted with ringing applause as he stepped forward, and from time to time during his speech he was enthusiastically cheered. Among other things

GEN. AVERILL SAID.

"When once outposts and pickets were set to guard my command against a brave and persistent enemy, I now stand alone a welcome guest. I thank God and you for the changed condition. I have experienced every vicissitude of war, including being killed, for I have been half killed twice, but of all the triumphs I have ever enjoyed this is VICTORY OF PEACE.

over to-day is the grandest and most satisfactory."

The speaker sketched the campaigns of his division during the war and touched upon the results of the war, and the valor and the chivalry of the south and related an anecdote of President Lincoln at the time of the visitors to the army of the Potomac, opposite Fredericksburg, in 1863. In the course of his interview with the president, Gen. Fitzhugh Lee in regard to the wounded of the latter's command. The speaker continued as follows:

The president asked: "Were you and General Lee friends?"

"Certainly, sir, we always had been."

"What would happen?" he asked.

"Should you meet on the battle field?"

"One or both of us would be badly hurt or killed," I said, "I am obliged to be a partisan."

He looked that picturesque and mournful face on his hand and after a pause said, with emotion:

"Oh my God! what a dreadful thing is war like this, where personal friends must slay each other."

I told him that undoubtedly General Lee thought he was doing his duty and I knew that I was doing mine.

"Yes," said Mr. Lincoln, "I understand your feelings, but there are many who would think that you ought to hate each other." Finally he said:

"General Averill I wish you would give me this letter of General Lee's."

"Certainly, tell it, Mr. President," I replied, and I have been told by one of his biographers that
